

OFFICERS ROW

OFFICERS ROW

O. O. Howard House
Built in 1829, this was the home of General Oliver Ota Howard, the commander of the military Department of the Columbia. It was restored to its former elegance in 1998 and now houses the offices of the Fort Vancouver National Trust.

To the Visitor Center
The center offers films, maps, brochures and other information about the Fort Vancouver National Historic Site.

EAST BARRACKS

WEST BARRACKS

Federal Highway Administration
Not part of the West Barracks

SOUTH BARRACKS

To the Village
The Village consists of two reconstructed houses, along with fences and trails that give visitors a sense of the vibrant and complex life of this mid-19th century community that supported the operations of Fort Vancouver.

Fort Vancouver, established in 1825
The British Hudson's Bay Company established an extensive fur trading network throughout the Pacific Northwest of which Fort Vancouver was the administrative center and principal supply depot. Today, the reconstructed 1840s-era Fort and Village, operated by the National Park Service, offer a glimpse into the lives of American Indians, settlers and fur traders. The fort is the site of many special events and interactive educational programs.

Learn more:
Find our interactive map, stories, videos and photos at www.columbian.com/fv

PROJECT TEAM: Columbian reporter Andrea Damewood, artist and designer Maria Harris, photographers Doug Waggoner, Zachary Kufnalski, and Tracy Lene, with Ben Bass. Thanks to the staffs of the Fort Vancouver National Trust, National Park Service, and Fort photographer Robert Holcomb.